ABSTRACT

The newsletter reports results from the National Special Education Curricula Survey completed by state department officials, college and university staff, and personnel from schools, community agencies, and special projects across the country. Respondents identified 230 exemplary special education curricula. Those curricula are listed alphabetically by title and provide information on source, source address, copyright date, approximate price, number of pages, recommended exceptionality area(s) and recommended level(s). A subject index in the beginning of the newsletter groups curricula by 14 disability types: mild mental retardation; moderate mental retardation; severe/profound mental handicaps; emotional handicaps; speech, hearing, and language disabilities; learning disabilities; blindness/visual impairments; giftedness; physical handicaps; multiple handicaps; career/vocational disabilities; deafness and hearing impairments; infancy; and preschool handicaps. Twenty-two subject areas are also identified: adaptive physical education, autism, bilingual, daily living, discipline, deaf/blind, English/spelling, IEP, juvenile detention, mainstreaming, math, non-vocal, paraprofessionals, parents, profession training, sex education, social studies, wheelchair training, affective education, study skills, science, and recreation/leisure. Educators' Guide to Exemplary Special Education Curricula: Results of a National Field Based Survey (1985)

REINVENTING WHEELS

Your school district wants to revise and improve the special education curricula. You were invited to be a member of the curriculum development committee. The first meeting was less than a success...half the committee members couldn't make the meeting, and the coffee and doughnuts (which were promised in lieu of pay) never did arrive. The second meeting was not much better. No one knew where to begin in searching for curricular models though one member kept mentioning the "red guide" she had seen as an undergraduate...but she couldn't remember it's title. Does this sound familiar? Did you attend those meetings? If so, read on, this issue is for you.

Curriculum development is a difficult task. It was made even more difficult because no national listing of special education curricula existed. It only follows that a listing of exemplary special education curricula did not exist..until now. The National Special Education Curricula Survey, a national service project of the Indiana Department of Education, is a project designed to identify exemplary special education curricula. If exemplary special education curricula can be identified (and they can), then curricula development committees throughout the nation will have models to use and may even identify an already developed curricula which can be used "off the shelf." Why reinvent the wheel?

The procedures used to identify exemplary special education curricula through the National Special Education Curricula Survey were as follows...First, reporting forms were sent to over 800 locations throughout the nation. These potential respondents included every state department of education, at least two universities in each state and hundreds of schools, community agencies and special projects. Respondents were asked to "identify exemplary special education curricula" by title, source, source address, copyright date, approximate price, number of pages, recommended exceptionality area(s) and recommended level(s). Respondents reported 230 guides as exemplary.

The body of this publication consists of an alphabetical listing of reported exemplary curricula including the title, source, source address, development date, price, number of pages, etc. for each guide. If a piece of information was not provided, such is indicated by "not reported" in the entry. Each title is preceeded by a sequential reference number which is used in conjunction with the Curricula Selection Index. The Curricula Selection Index is a listing of respective reference numbers, by category, to aid in curricula identification.

In summary, the Special Educators' Guide to Exemplary Curricula: Results of a National Field Based Survey (1985) is a complete listing of exemplary special education curricula as reported through the Indiana Department of Education's National Special Education Curricula Survey. Hopefully, this publication will aid all involved in special education curricula development and selection. Exemplary curricula is the beginning of Excellence in Education.
